Meet Sarah Bloom! She is a social policy and sociology double major interested in a career in public policy or nonprofit work, attended the Women in Public Policy seminar from January 12-16, 2016.

Describe yourself and why you wanted to attend the PLEN Conference.

I am a senior from Chicago and was informed about the conference through a previous professor, Anna Mahoney. I have taken many political science classes and consider myself to be very politically active, however, I never considered working in politics. I have a lot of experience in the nonprofit world — I started my own and sit on the board for another — but I never saw that work as something could lead to a profession. I wanted to attend the conference to explore the field, gain exposure to potential career paths, and practice professionalism and networking.

Describe your favorite parts of the conference.

I think my favorite part of the conference was hearing how all these different powerful women got to where they are. It made me realize that I do not need to be thinking about a long-term career, necessarily. It was reassuring to know that the vast majority of women had long, winding paths and most of them did not have a clear end goal in sight. With hard work, and flexibility, I have confidence that I will end up where I want to be.

Who was your favorite speaker?

I really enjoyed the salary negotiation speaker, Shelby Olson. She gave us a lot of concrete advice when it comes to determining one's market value. She walked us through different interview scenarios, stressing the importance of timing and appropriate communication. I believe the tips she gave me will be valuable for the rest of my professional life.

What was your most important takeaway?

As mentioned, I think the salary negotiation tips will be very helpful moving forward. Additionally, I think the greatest lessons I learned overlapped with all the speakers, which were to: 1) actively seek out opinions of the opposition, and 2) not pretend to know something you do not know.

Why should other students attend a PLEN conference?

I think PLEN is great for networking and exposure. Anyone with a slight interest will find something valuable about the conference and many end up finding connections that lead to internships and jobs. I think it is also very important to stress how cool it is to be in a room with women in male-dominated fields. Their stories are the stories of many powerful female leaders and as young women, we benefit from their life experiences.
